

CASE-05

Behavioral Summary

Metric	Value
Total posts collected	90.0
Data span days	72.0
Posting frequency per day	1.26
Late night post ratio	74%
Avg sentiment score	0.31
Negative post ratio	16%
First person pronoun ratio	3%
Mental health subreddit ratio	18%
Unique subreddits visited	49

Sample Posts

Post 1 | 2025-10-11 23:15 UTC | r/Anxiety | comment | ↑ 2

Hey, I know this an old thread but thought I'd chime in if it helps someone out. The chest/throat muscles are all linked, as with the stomach too, to our nervous system and to our flight/fight reactions. Anxiety is a regular trigger for this and will make your chest tighten, throat tighten, stomach churn etc. This is our brains telling us that something (like a mammoth or sabre tooth tiger) is coming to kill us. That there is a threat. All of these are very normal symptoms of anxiety and are phy

Post 2 | 2025-10-28 22:36 UTC | r/Anxiety | comment | ↑ 2

So this may be a weird thing to wrap your head around whilst you're in the middle of it, but tell yourself don't fight it.

One, trust that it's anxiety, and pay attention to that. I've found recently telling yourself 'thank you brain, for keeping me safe. But I don't need it right now'. Being compassionate to yourself works wonders.

Two. Literally say to yourself don't fight this. Let it run it's course. Panic is like a wave, and it rides up and down. You have to surf, let the waves do thei

Post 3 | 2025-11-01 22:43 UTC | r/Anxiety | comment | ↑ 1

I have never taken medications for anxiety, partly because I have health anxiety and my mum from a young age told me Doctors and Medications are a lie. It's bullshit that I'm having to undo but whatever.

Therapy is a good one obviously, but finding the right teacher is important. Mine is a clinical psychologist but he is also a mindfulness and Buddhism practitioner, a lot of which helps the anxious mind.

Ultimately, this is what I'm trying to teach myself: when you're anxious, panicking, wha

Post 4 | 2025-11-01 22:48 UTC | r/Anxiety | comment | ↑ 21

I'm going to copy and paste my comment from another thread about panic attacks. I hope this helps!

So this may be a weird thing to wrap your head around whilst you're in the middle of it, but tell yourself don't fight it.

One, trust that it's anxiety, and pay attention to that. I've found recently telling yourself 'thank you brain, for keeping me safe. But I don't need it right now'. Being compassionate to yourself works wonders. You need to take the steering wheel back. Even saying to yours

Post 5 | 2025-11-07 22:17 UTC | r/Anxiety | comment | ↑ 3

Few tips :

Trust that it's just anxiety, not anything more.

Anxiety is safe, you aren't in danger.

Panic attacks are scary. I haven't had one in years then I had a few in succession. Now, every time my anxiety spikes I think I'm about to have one. Believe me it will calm down eventually, but you need to try to tell yourself you're reacting to the panic symptoms rather than actually having a panic attack.

Every time you feel the anxiety, breathe in for 7 seconds, hold for 5, out for 7 then

Post 6 | 2025-11-08 20:31 UTC | r/HealthAnxiety | comment | ↑ 3

I am totally with you on the anticipatory grief. I just lost my grandmother and both the build up and the loss has sent me absolutely spiralling. Haven't felt this bad in years. I'm not even focusing specifically on any one illness, I'm just terrified that something is going to happen to me out of the blue (fear of fear, panic attacks) which is making me super jumpy and jittery, and the worst part is it's when I'm in bed/relaxing. I'm sure it will pass but I'm absolutely sick of it

Post 7 | 2025-11-09 14:38 UTC | r/HealthAnxiety | comment | ↑ 3

If you had any internal bleeding your ug rate would be in the 1000's fyi. Normally 10-100 is inconclusive but needs investigating, but they will usually test for other things like inflammation or do blood tests to compare too. My GP literally said don't worry I'm not worried so I have to trust them! I've had IBS for the last few months due to stress/grief. Your stomach can do wild things as it's linked to your brain, and the same nerves that cause anxiety are linked to your stomach. I know it sounds

Post 8 | 2025-11-13 21:05 UTC | r/Anxiety | comment | ↑ 1

On the extreme end im going to the toilet like 3/4 times a day and it's super loose. I've had it since my grandma died a few months back. Unfortunately im now going for a colonoscopy because of a small amount of blood and a positive FIT test, but my GP said its almost definitely because of the IBS for a week straight. I didnt have cramps or pain, just going to the toilet alot.

Essentially, I wouldn't worry unless it gets super extreme, you loose alot of weight, or theres alot of blood that isn
